

I don' t have the technical expertise or resources of the FCC, of course, but from what I have read, BPL would be an absolute nightmare to the amateur radio users, as well as many other FCC licensed legitimate users of the "people's airwaves". Considering how long and with how much effort and expense the FCC has stayed an advocate of those users by helping curtail interferences of all sorts on the radio bands, I would hope that if this technology is the death knell of open radio communications that I am reading it could be, that the commission would keep it from ruining not just a hobby, but an important emergency services resource in this country.
